Abstract

This paper aims to analyze the changes in the purchasing power of wages in Mexico, ensuring that an average family can consume a Well-being Basket (WB). The WB was developed in 2019 by the International Observatory of Living Wages and consists of three components: food, food preparation, and non-food items. Unlike a basic basket, it includes goods and services that guarantee a dignified level of living, not just survival. The construction of the Basket follows a composite index methodology based on consumption weights, and comparisons use a Laspeyres index. The results show that despite the post-pandemic inflationary period, extraordinary increases in the minimum wage reduced the purchasing gap by 42%. However, this remains insufficient, making it necessary for this wage recovery policy to extend beyond a single presidential term.

Introduction

During the neoliberal period (1988-2018), the purchasing power of the minimum wage fell to three-quarters of the value reached in 1976, which impacted the deterioration of the quality of life for Mexicans and increased general poverty and labor poverty in particular. In 2018, with a significant shift in economic policy, the drive to recover the purchasing power of wages began, which increased extraordinarily above inflation to fulfill the mandate of the second paragraph of section VI of Article 123 of the Constitution, stipulating that wages should be sufficient for a family head to cover their material, social, and cultural needs, as well as provide for the education of their children.

In this regard, the International Observatory of Decent Salaries (OISAD) proposed a methodology for measuring the essential wage based on the construction of a consumption basket (Arellano et al., 2020a), which was later called the “well-being basket” (Arellano et al., 2020b). Unlike conventional basic baskets, it considers the issue of social well-being not only in terms of food but also through a non-food consumption pattern that includes education, recreation, culture, housing, festivities, among other expenses.

The post-pandemic period initiated a phase of great economic instability, prolonged by factors such as the Russia-Ukraine war. At the end of the global Covid-19 pandemic, a demand shock (an increase in demand beyond supply capacities) affected price stability worldwide. Simultaneously, the shortage of basic grains and energy (particularly gas) from Russia and Ukraine resulted in the highest inflation rates since the 1980s. The response of major economies was a restrictive monetary policy that slowed growth, while the limited fiscal space in many countries made economic stimulus difficult, so recovery is not expected until beyond 2025 (World Bank, 2023a).

The unprecedented rise in inflation, which reached double digits in European regions, always disproportionately affects the poorest deciles of the population. The World Bank report (2023b) demonstrated an unequal inflation burden: in the poorest decile, inflation was 2% higher and increases proportionally with the level of a country's development. The poorest countries experienced inflationary inequalities of up to 5%, making it essential to monitor the living conditions of the population in a country like ours during this globally unstable period.

Due to the global Covid-19 pandemic, the measurement of the Well-being Basket costs was interrupted in 2021 and 2022. Therefore, the objective of this work is to analyze the changes in the purchasing power of wages in Mexico so that an average family can consume a Well-being Basket, in order to evaluate the partial results of wage policy during the 2018-2024 administration. The ultimate goal is to provide reliable information that allows timely decision-making in labor matters. For the cost update, the methodology proposed in 2019 was replicated, which calculates based on a composite index, while the Laspeyres index was used for the year-on-year comparison.

The first part of this paper presents a literature review on the construction of consumption baskets as a measure of population well-being; the second part describes the methodology used; the results are then explained and discussed, and finally, the conclusions are presented.

Literature Review

A consumption basket is a set of goods and services representing a spending model or pattern to cover the needs of an individual or a family. It reflects the level of satisfaction or requirements to meet these needs and, therefore, is often used in economics as a measure to approximate the population's level of well-being. The greater the access a population has to a basket that allows for a higher number of satisfiers, the higher its level of well-being will be. Most of the population's consumption under normal conditions comes from wages (Shaik, 2013), making it crucial to evaluate the purchasing power of wages concerning the cost of consumption baskets.

When measuring well-being/poverty based on income, there is a bias due to public transfers, third-party support, and donations that supplement family income. However, considering measurement based on the specific needs of population groups brings us closer to more realistic situations and allows for the design of more efficient public policies (Mocarelli et al., 2023).

Besides being used as a proxy measure of well-being, a consumption basket also enables us to analyze the inflationary level impacting the population with that specific consumption pattern. It allows us to calculate well-being gaps to make decisions regarding labor matters, such as wage adjustments, and even serves as a leading indicator of an economic cycle downturn resulting from the stagnation of the labor-wage relationship (Foley, 2011).

From the perspective of this research, a consumption basket is a reference tool for designing and implementing public policies. Therefore, its construction should consider not only the population's consumption patterns but also the ideal aspects of consumption, i.e., the normative consumption and the conditions in which consumption occurs. For example, if a population's consumption patterns do not include attending cultural events, it does not imply that this item should be omitted from their consumption basket since it is ideal for that population to have access to cultural products.

Wages, as remuneration for labor, must be sufficient to, on the one hand, reconstitute the labor force, meaning the nutritional, rest, and other satisfiers so a worker can regain enough energy to work the next day; on the other hand, reproduce the labor force, meaning the material and social conditions for the proletariat to continue, which includes the upbringing and education of workers' children (Marx, 1849).

From this perspective, Booth and Rowntree measured in 1902 the nutritional requirements for a York worker to maintain an acceptable physical performance, achieving the first standardized food formula (Torres, 2014). In the United States, the measurement of standardized nutritional requirements originated with Orshansky's work (1965), which served as an instrument for measuring poverty until 2006.

In Mexico, the earliest precedent for constructing a consumption basket is found in the COPLAMAR (1982) proposal (General Coordination of the National Plan for Depressed Areas and Marginalized Groups of the Presidency of the Republic), which was called the Normative Basket of Essential Satisfiers and represented an advanced perspective for its time as it included both food and non-food items. Recently, Boltvinik (2012), from the Ministry of Social Development of Mexico City, has resumed COPLAMAR's proposal by updating consumption patterns to include development technologies (computers and compact discs).

Many Latin American countries include in their inflation indicators the measurement based on consumption baskets they consider basic (Morán et al., 2018) as they only include essential products, excluding a range of unmet needs that remain invisible. This intentionality is explained because, despite being only basic baskets, they reflect an alarming level of poverty for the region, which worsened after the Covid-19 pandemic. For example, in Ecuador, 70% of families cannot afford a basic basket (Zamora & Arteaga, 2023).

The effects of the pandemic were so profound that they quickly altered consumption patterns, mainly due to the high inflationary cost, as revealed by a study using credit card data from Germany and the United Kingdom (Grigoli & Pugacheva, 2024). Therefore, systematic monitoring of the consumption baskets' updates is essential to best reflect the population's access to both food and non-food goods.

Materials and Methods

The Well-being Basket is calculated based on the composition of an average household in our country: four members, with at least one under the age of 15 (INEGI, 2022). It comprises three components, as indicated in Table 1.

The first component is the Food Basket, which considers the daily energy requirements in kilocalories by sex and age group, assuming moderate physical activity, following the Dietary and Physical Activity Guidelines of the National Academy of Medicine (ANM, 2015). The daily nutritional requirement was distributed based on the equivalents of the Mexican System (Pérez, 2014), which were used for calculating the initial 2019 basket (Arellano et al., 2020a). To estimate its cost (C_A), equation (1) is followed:

$$C_A = \sum_{i=1}^n (p_{it} * q_i * \beta_i) \quad (1)$$

p_{it} , represents the average price of the i -th item in period t .

q_i , represents the required consumption quantity.

β_i , represents the equivalent in portions per month.

The second component includes the goods and services required for the preparation and preservation of food, such as utensils and tools, as well as electricity and gas, considering the prorated value of the goods relative to their useful life, based on a study by Calderón (2014). To estimate its cost (C_{PA}), equation (2) is followed:

$$C_{PA} = \sum_{i=1}^n (p_{it} * q_i * \theta_i) \quad (2)$$

p_{it} , represents the average price of the i -th item in period t .

θ_i , represents the useful life weight of the good.

Lastly, the third component is the Non-Food Basket, which includes 11 groups of needs as shown in Table 1. To represent the monthly costs, the useful life of each good or service acquired was considered, or in the case of non-recurring expenses, the frequency of the expense over a determined time horizon for a household. To estimate its cost (C_{NA}), equation (3) is followed:

$$C_{NA} = \sum_{i=1}^n (p_{it} * q_i * \delta_i) \quad (3)$$

Where:

p_{it} , represents the average price of the i -th item in period t .

q_i , represents the required consumption quantity.

δ_i , represents the useful life weight of the good.

Note. Own elaboration

Prices were obtained through a mixed survey: on-site and through online sales points (virtual store) of establishments previously selected in Mexico City during the first half of November 2023. The calculation was performed using the arithmetic mean of market prices. Assuming that a head of household is an economic actor and thus optimizes with perfect information, the two selected establishments represent those with the lowest prices reported during the last week of October 2023 in the measurement by the Federal Consumer Protection Agency (PROFECO).

The Basket considers the acquisition of goods only through the market and does not include meals consumed outside the home (Arellano et al., 2020a).

For the comparison of prices between years, the Laspeyres index ($L_{(p)}$), shown in equation (4), was considered. This index takes a base year as a reference, in this case, it was 2019, which was the first measurement of the OISAD.

$$L_{(p)} = \frac{\sum_{j=1}^n p_{j,t} q_{j,0}}{\sum_{j=1}^n p_{j,0} q_{j,0}} * 100 \quad (4)$$

Where:

$p_{j,t}$, indicates the average price of the good in period t .

Results and Discussion

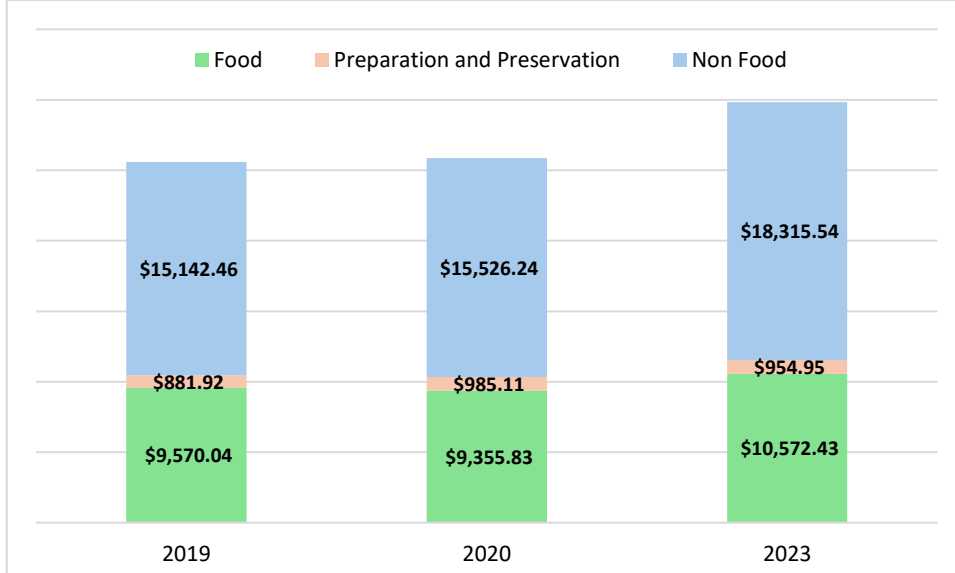

The 2023 Well-being Basket had a total cost of $29,842.92. In the annex section, the results are presented disaggregated by group and subgroup, as well as the individual average prices of each good. Given its comparability with previous OISAD measurements (Arellano et al., 2020a and Arellano et al., 2020b), we can note that the costs of the Basket increased by 15.36%. The greatest increase was for the Non-Food Basket, which rose by 17.9% from $15,526.24 in 2020 to $18,315.54 in 2023, as shown in Figure 1. Evaluated by components, we can observe that the costs of food preparation had a slight reduction of 3.14%, primarily due to the decrease in gas prices (Gas del Bienestar), but also due to decreases in prices of goods such as refrigerators and stoves explained by the increase in the peso-dollar exchange rate.

It is important to consider that during the 2020-2023 period, as a consequence of the lingering effects of the demand shock following the pandemic and subsequently the Ukraine-Russia war, the world has experienced the highest inflation rates in the last 40 years, and our country was no exception. The Food Basket, which would represent non-core inflation, had a smaller increase compared to the non-food basket, at just 13%, partly explained by an increase in national production and a reduction in dependency on foreign imports.

Furthermore, it is also important to highlight that the energy policies during the six-year term mitigated increases in price levels, unlike other countries, mainly our trading partners in the United States and Canada, as well as the European Union. The strengthening of the Mexican peso has acted as a buffer against inflation because imported goods, such as appliances, become cheaper.

Note. Own elaboration

Regarding the comparison of wage incomes, we can observe that in the index shown in Figure 2, the national general minimum wage increased by 202%, nearly doubling the increases in the Basket and its components. This signifies a real increase in purchasing power measured from the Well-being Basket.

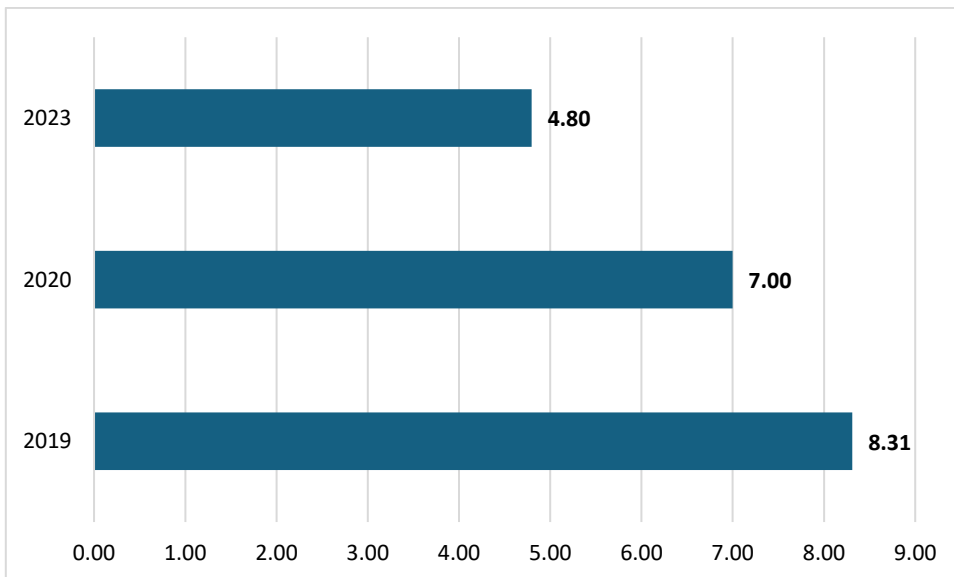

In terms of wage gaps illustrated in Figure 3, we can observe that at the beginning of the six-year term, 8.3 general minimum wages were required to acquire the Well-being Basket, and there has been a consistent reduction so that, by 2023, only 4.8 general minimum wages were needed. If we consider the minimum wage in municipalities on the northern border, this gap reduces to 2.65 (assuming that prices in the northern border municipalities are approximately similar to those in Mexico City). This demonstrates a real reduction in the wage purchasing power gap and is undoubtedly one of the most favorable outcomes of the economic policies of the current six-year term.

Note. Own elaboration

If we consider the wages of the formal economy, reported to the Mexican Social Security Institute (IMSS, 2024), for the month of November 2023, it was 537.87 pesos per day or 16,351.24 pesos per month, which means that the gap is 1.8 salaries to acquire a Well-being Basket. This represents the highest increase in labor income in 40 years.

Currently, the National Council for the Evaluation of Social Development Policy (CONEVAL, 2024) constructs an extreme poverty line by income (LPEI) based on the value of a food basket per person per month and a poverty line by income (LPI) based on the sum of the value of a food and non-food basket. These baskets consider the conditions in which they are consumed, so they are measured in two different areas: urban and rural.

As of November 2023 (the same measurement date as our Well-being Basket), CONEVAL's (2024) food basket in the urban area had a value of $2,225.57, for the rural area it was $1,703.61; while the sum of the food and non-food basket in the urban area was $4,415.03 and in the rural area it was $3,184.66. This approximates a cost for a household of 4 members between $17,660.00 to $12,736.00 depending on the area. It is worth noting that in the case of our Basket, it is not possible to calculate it in individual terms, as it considers the expansion of household spending, for example, food preparation prices do not double when cooking for two people instead of one. However, our results are consistent with CONEVAL's conclusions in pointing out that there is an evident recovery of the purchasing power of wage incomes, and that this recovery is the highest recorded throughout the neoliberal period.

Conclusion

The results of this research show that despite the period of economic instability due to the Covid-19 pandemic and the Russia-Ukraine war, the impact on the costs of the Well-being Basket in Mexico has been mitigated by the economic policies of the current six-year term: containment of energy prices (gas, gasoline, and electricity) which decreased in real terms; the increase in agricultural productivity that tempered non-core inflation, and the solid macroeconomic fundamentals that allowed the appreciation of the Mexican peso and hence the decrease in import costs.

On the other hand, the labor policy, which promoted extraordinary increases in the minimum wage to recover lost purchasing power during the neoliberal period, achieved a significant reduction in the wage gap for a family to access a Well-being Basket and caused a beacon effect on the rest of the formal wages reported to the IMSS, significantly reducing labor poverty in Mexico.

While the Well-being Basket has significant limitations such as including regional consumption patterns to make it comparative with the national population, it represents an important approach to measuring the level of satisfaction achieved by a family and is therefore an indirect measure of poverty and inequality. The systematic monitoring of the evolution of the costs of this basket allows economic and political actors to make timely decisions to increase the well-being levels of the population.

Finally, in this work, we have limited ourselves to measuring the acquisition of a Well-being Basket through labor income, and we recognize significant progress in reducing wage gaps. It is important to highlight that household incomes have increased due to government transfers via social programs; however, our objective is for wages to be sufficient to acquire a family's consumption basket and thereby avoid clientelistic actions that do not dignify the working class, so it is important to promote a cross-term policy that continues with the recovery of wages through extraordinary increases above inflation.
